Jinji Chocolate: A New Approach to Chocolate Consumption

Jinji Fraser and her father, Guy Fraser, opened Jinji Chocolate in Baltimore, a shop that pays homage to Indigenous traditions in the Caribbean and Mesoamerica. This shop serves seven types of drinking chocolate, combining local ingredients with cacao sourced from family-owned farms in Trinidad and Peru. The signature bitter drinking chocolate, a rich and dense concoction served in an espresso-size cup, is made with freshly ground cacao nibs, lightly sweetened, and finished with oat milk. Jinji's goal is to rethink how people consume chocolate and to highlight the energetic and spiritual side of cacao.

This past summer, new federal energy-efficiency regulations went into effect, preventing the sale of most incandescent light bulbs. This prompted some hand-wringing among interior designers, but LEDs are way better than they used to be. "What matters most is the bulb's color temperature, which is measured in degrees Kelvin," said the lighting designer Jean Pelle. She recommends bulbs from RAB for a nice light. Interior stylist Benjamin Reynaert suggests low-wattage bulbs with a soft glow for creating a cozy ambience. He recommends the Schoolhouse Matte Porcelain LED bulb.

A Minneapolis Restaurant Where the Pasta Is Handmade and the Interiors Evoke Summer

Chef Joe Rolle and bartender Stephen Rowe opened Dario, an Italian-leaning restaurant in Minneapolis. One star of the menu is Rolle's Doppio Ravioli, filled with half sunchoke purée and half whipped ricotta, served with brown butter, honey, fried rosemary, and hazelnuts. Dario's pastas are made by hand daily in a room at the back of the restaurant. In the evening, that space, with its 14-foot butcher block table, becomes a communal dining area. In the main dining room, the interiors are textured and summery.

Portella, a 14-room property in Palma Majorca, recently opened, offering exceptional boutique hotel accommodations. The creators, Enrique and Inés Miró-Sans and the Paris-based design duo Festen, wanted to create "an oasis of calm and green in the city." They drew on the history of the 17th-century palazzo where the hotel is located to create a unique and personable space.

cacao. Heide Hendricks, a co-founder of the Connecticut-based design firm Hendricks Churchill, recommends bulbs from Tala, a British company known for its eco-friendly statement bulbs. “They come in a range of shapes and emit beautiful, incandescent-like light,” she says, noting that they’re ideal for fixtures with exposed bulbs.

With these new perspectives in mind, people can enjoy chocolate in a whole new way, while also elevating their interior lighting to create a cozy and inviting atmosphere in their homes. You can also venture into new restaurant experiences to taste handmade pasta and enjoy the bright and inspiring interiors.
